EXCLUSIVE ENTRY

Gates create a boundary between the public and private, allowing for entry dependant on the situation of open or closed. This concept is overruled however, by the voids apparent within the ornamental gate door. The voids seemingly now ensure the gate is never truly closed, as all range of matter can seemingly pass through, providing clues for as to what sits within the boundary for those passing by. The membrane is exclusive as to what is allowed in, seemingly blocking more than can be allowed in, essentially controlling its occupancy.

ELEVATION

When open the door allows all matter through, however, even when closed we see how certain matter can still pass through and omit to the other side.

SELECTIVE DINING
 This re-imagination utilizes the system instead to act in a commercial experience, with food of a certain size passing through contactless voids.
